COURSE DESCRIPTION

Treating people with HIV is complex and challenging. The moral, emotional, political, ethical, legal, and clinical issues that are involved in the such treatment often present a conflicting set of views, attitudes, priorities, and values. Often, the HIV policy debate is characterized as an inevitable conflict between public health and individual rights. Issues of discrimination, economic justice, and racial and gender biases are highly relevant to the understanding of the global HIV crisis. Clinicians who are working with people diagnosed with HIV/AIDS often face not only the emotionally intense and complicated clinical challenge of helping people in deep crisis but also the need to bear with conflicting laws, vague ethical guidelines, and inconsistent regulations.

This course intends to address the ethical, legal, and clinical issues that surround treating the HIV positive individual. It will help clinicians identify the relevant standard of care and learn to conduct thorough and ethical decision-making. More specifically, the course will cover the relevant CA laws and relevant professional organizations' codes of ethics. Finally, the course will attempt to help clinicians deal effectively with the emotional and other challenges that working with people with HIV present and devise ways to prevent burnout and increase self-care.
